Clinical trial brings remission for blood cancer

One year after starting in a clinical trial for treatment of blood cancer, Brian and his family received the welcome news that he is now cancer-free.

"I think it's really hard to describe. It's sort of like the whole weight of the world comes off your shoulders, so you can get on with life now," Brian said.

Five years later and Brian is still enjoying life with his wife of 60 years (pictured right celebrating 60 years of marriage with some of their family), his 4 children, 13 grandchildren and 8 great-grandchildren. He's even been able to enjoy some long-held dreams to travel in Australia and enjoy some fishing with his eldest son.

Brian had been working full time when he fell at home in 2016. Taken to Mater Hospital for tests, he subsequently received a diagnosis of Chronic Lymphocytic Leukaemia (CLL).

Brian had been contemplating a limited future when one of his doctors said, "Brian, there's a trial, you can go on this trial". His daughter Tammy recalls "we just thought 'wow, how fortunate is he to be almost on death's door, to where he probably needed to go into a nursing home because he wouldn't be able to walk any longer, and boom!'"

Brian and his wife surrounded by their extended family.

Brian was part of a randomised clinical trial of the drug Acalabrutinib at Mater that was led by Mater Haematology with researchers Dr Naadir Gutta and Dr Mimi Yue. The trial drug Brian was taking is now approved by the Therapeutic Goods Administration (TGA) and available under the Public Benefit Scheme (PBS).
